

ABSTRACT

A fuel cell system is provided which includes a fluid pump such as an ejector pump. The fluid pump is designed to be driven 5 by energy of air flowing within an air line through which air is supplied to a fuel cell. The fluid pump works to suck a fluid containing drops of water and residual gasses from the hydrogen line, thereby ensuring desired startability and stability of operation of the fuel cell.